Felix the Cat had been sitting on the dock for some time with his fishing pole lazily propped between his knees. He hadn't caught any fish at all, and he was getting awfully warm as the sun was beating down upon him. As he looked out to sea, he could see the gleaming white sails of boats as they bobbed merrily in the distance. The water looked so cool and inviting Felix was beginning to regret that he had chosen such a warm day to fish on that dock where there was nothing to protect him from the increasingly hot rays of the sun.

"I wish I could be a fish," Felix thought to himself, "They never suffer from the heat. All they have to do all day long is to swim in that lovely cool water."

That gave Felix an idea. He took his fishing pole apart and noticed that the sections were hollow. He took the largest of these and blew through it.

"This will do the trick," he exclaimed. "I'll jump into the water and use this tube to breathe through. Then I can live like a fish and never feel the heat."

Felix did just that. He took the hollow tube, put one end into his mouth and jumped into the water. By keeping one end of the tube above water and breathing through the other end, he was able to swim under water and still get plenty of air.

"I'll show these fish a thing or two!" Felix said as he started to explore the underwater world that lay before him.

He swam around a while enjoying the cool water. "This is the life," he thought to himself, "swimming without a care in the world."

He saw all kinds of fish, little ones, big ones, brightly colored ones. They swam up to him, stared a little while as if puzzled, then scooted rapidly away.

"I guess they wonder what kind of a fish I am," Felix laughed.

Just then, from behind a rock, a ferocious looking octopus popped right in front of Felix. The octopus lunged at him with his tentacles, and it was only because of Felix's agility that he was able to avoid being caught. He swam as fast as he could until the octopus was unable to keep up with him.

"Whew! That was a narrow escape!" Felix sighed as he sat down upon a rock to rest. He had only been sitting there a few moments when he noticed that several fishing lines with baited hooks were being let down in front of him. Felix looked upward, and saw a rowboat floating above him. One of the men leaned over the side of the boat and tried to catch Felix with a handnet. The net swished by Felix, almost catching him.

"Oh-oh—someone's out fishing, but they won't catch me!" said Felix as he adjusted his air-pipe and swam rapidly away.

As Felix swam away from the boatful of fishermen, he didn't notice that another vicious-looking fish was watching him from behind a clump of seaweed. This fish had long sharp teeth. He jumped out at Felix, just as he was nearing the seaweed.

"Yipe!—a dogfish!" Felix cried as he quickly twisted and doubled back toward the direction that he was coming from.

Felix swam as fast as he knew how He looked back and saw that the dogfish was right after him He strained every muscle and tried to swim even faster. Still the dogfish was close behind him. Felix looked around, and to his horror he saw that the dogfish was getting closer and closer Felix sucked some air through his breathing tube and swam as he never swam before. Suddenly he bumped into something He looked up and exclaimed, "Wow! a swordfish! Right in front of me!"

Sure enough it was, an angry-looking swordfish right in front of Felix There he was trapped between the two savage fish!

Felix took a deep breath through his breathing tube and then dived deeply and quickly. Instead of chasing after him, the two fish saw each other and began fighting. Felix hit the bottom with a thud. He was standing there for a moment thinking about what he should do next. Just then, a lobster crawling along the bottom nipped Felix's tail.

"Ow!" cried Felix in dismay "This business of being a fish isn't so comfortable."

He noticed that he had dropped his breathing tube when the lobster nipped him. It was too dark down there under the water to find it He started to swim upward towards the surface to get some air when suddenly he was whirled and churned around rapidly by the propeller of a ship which happened to be passing by He was spinning around for almost a minute, gulping salt water, when—as quickly as he was caught—he was thrown clear of the propeller into deep water

The next thing Felix knew, he was being pulled upward through the water He knew that he wasn't swimming, because he was still groggy from all the salt water that he had swallowed It was then that he realized that the propeller must have thrown him right into a fishing net, and the fishermen were pulling in their catch

An instant later, Felix was dumped onto the deck of a fishing boat amid thousands of wriggling fish

"Ho ho—It looks as if we've caught ourselves a catfish!" laughed one of the fishermen as he helped Felix to his feet

"That's no catfish," another fisherman exclaimed "That's Felix the Cat. How did you get into our fish net?"

"I was trying to live like a fish," Felix told them, "because it seemed like such a peaceful and pleasant life I found that being a fish is more than swimming lazily in a cool pool of water Being a fish is dangerous!"

"Well, I see you've learned your lesson, Felix," the first fisherman said "We'll take you back to shore so you can start being a cat again."
